2 ▼ They are there specifically to hedge against our domain name registration being lost. The alternate sites are alternate pointers to the same server infrastructure -- kind of like having one cell phone that has several numbers.

Failures earlier looked like the site was getting over loaded. So like the phone itself was busy.

The admins have it set up this way because if something happens to TheDonald.win domain name for any reason, it destroys our ability to find the site again, so backups are needed. If one of the "phone numbers" goes away, basically, then we need another way to call them.

If something happens downstream of that -- so to the cloudflare service, or the servers actually hosting the site, the admins can migrate to different services ASAP, and point the TheDonald.win domain name there again. This is analogous to dropping the phone and breaking it. You just get a new one, and your friends are able to reach you as soon as your old number is ported over.

The tend to be located in geologically stable areas that have cheap electricity and few natural disasters.

I've seen estimates that Google buys a two digit percentage of all hard drives sold on the planet. There are thousands upon thousands of interchangeable servers. When one goes down another takes its place more or less instantly.

Trying to physically take down YouTube would be like trying to kill a swarm of locusts with a fly swatter. You could kill individuals, but the swarm wouldn't notice.

Given the vulnerability of some of our backbone internet infrastructure (in particular DNS, and arguable the underlying power grid), it might actually be easier to knock the entire internet off line than it would be to knock Google off the internet.

Server farms need power and they are true tied. It is quite easy to take down the grid in a given area. Years ago we had a blackout across all of San Diego and other areas (millions upon millions without for maybe 12 hours?). They blamed that on one utility worker in Arizona. Now imagine deliberate attacks on major unprotected lines, transformers. It's really simple too. My utility now has to preemptively deenergize whole areas during winds cause the lines have previously started fires.

Look up the test run attack on the power station outside San Francisco. Honestly if it comes to civil war the blue cities are done qjicklh. I do not wish it, but sometimes you have to amputate to stop MRSA.

Please make sure you and your loved ones are ready for more than a month of darkness. Ttir drawing near.

permalink parent save report block reply fragile the power grid really is.

Residential power doesn't matter too much one way or the other, at least for most of us. You start digging into all the infrastructure outside your home that goes away if the lights go out... yeah. I'm about as prepared as a guy in suburbia can be, but I don't think anyone is prepared for the humanitarian crisis that will ensue if people start knocking out substations and this giant machine we live inside grinds to a halt.

If people thought COVID-19 was fun they're gonna love Cholera and scurvy.

▼ Gingrich has tried for a while to get the gov to protect the grid against EMP or solar flare. Even wrote a book, One Second After.

Total grid failure would be worse than all other disasters combined and the nation might not ever recover fully.

No safe drinking water for most, total shutdown of all that we take for granted for over a century. Unlike a place like Afghanisan, we are so redundant we are not resilient. We depend on pumps and refrigeration and computers.

▼ There are backup domain names if those get lost, but when the site itself is overloaded it's overloaded. It'll come back up as soon as possible.

There almost certainly isn't a single specific server behind this site -- it will be a pool of servers that the admins rent from some hosting company or other. There are already tons of backups in the physic sense, but if enough people come here at once (or attackers flood us with traffic) then all the backi be busy.

The backup names are there because the mechanism that points you at this website when you typ
TheDonald.win into your browser is not (and cannot be) under the admins' direct control, so that could go

1 It does that because it's overloaded and is concerned that it is under attack.

 Any legitimate user's IP could also be an attack vector, since any one of us could unknowingly be part of a botnet. On a site this large, it's a near certainty that some of us ARE unknowingly part of some bot net.

This place is probably running at the highest capacity ever and a target for constant attack. Those two things are hard to tell apart. When you see that screen you are seeing a system that is at the limits of it's resources and doing the best it can to resist a possible attack. Send it happy thoughts.

▼ no its not, I tested that. its not that the site is "rate limiting" us individually, but the reason for it is bandwidth.

the site is being inundated with so many visitors (real and fake bots trying to DDoS us) that it runs out of bandwidth or comes damn near close so the server starts rate limiting it.
